SECTION-A (READING)

A.1. Read the passage given below and complete the sentences by writing the options that you consider the most appropriate in your answer sheet : [5]

Of all the inventions of science, electricity is perhaps the most useful on the practical side of life. In almost every sphere of life, we find electricity at work. Mills and factories are worked by electricity, trains move by electricity ; most of the printing work is done by machines driven by electricity. Electricity is used to run fans, lifts, tube wells , ploughshares, winnowing machines and so many other things.

Electricity is a great source of light; it turns night into day.

If electricity fails, it can very easily be imagined what will happen. Work will stop in almost all the factories and mills. Machines will come to a dead stop and thousands of workers will find themselves idle. In most of the offices that are underground and even overground, there can be no work without lights or fans.

Modern age is said to be an age of the inventions of science. But no other invention of science has brought about such a great change as electricity. Unavailability of electricity for some time will make the world feel that the old backward times have returned. People have become so used to electric-lights and fans that they will feel most unhappy if electricity fails even for a short time. High government officials and the rich will have a difficult time due to the failure of electricity.
